COLORFUL PHLOX for Your Garden!

LILLIAN

UNDOUBTEDLY, Perennial Phlox is the outstanding perennial for summer gardens. No other perennial gives a more colorful and satisfactory display through the months of July, August, and September. When we consider the wide color-range, the large flower-heads, and the delightful fragrance of the Phlox, we realize that this worth-while perennial is indispensable.

Planting-Time. Phlox can be planted from April 1 through late May; in the fall, any time from September 1 until hard frost. As with most perennials planted in the fall, a mulch of dry straw or some other dry material will be found most satisfactory. Don't forget this mulch must be applied after the ground is frozen.

Location. Phlox can be used successfully and effectively in partially shaded locations or it can be grown in full sun. If you have an area where the soil is moist and well drained, Phlox will do well there. However, Phlox will grow satisfactorily in your garden if you water it during extended dry spells.

Blooming Season. In selecting varieties of Phlox, bear in mind that if you select carefully you can have a colorful display of bloom for nearly three months. The varieties are classified according to their period of bloom—early, midseason and late. Check the list on the reverse side of this folder carefully before you decide on the varieties you are going to plant.

Care and Cultivation. Like most perennials, Phlox needs to be divided every three years. When you dig up old clumps and divide them, remove the old soil and replace it with new, well-enriched soil.

Cut off the blooming heads as soon as they are faded. By preventing Phlox from going to seed, you will keep your garden free of undesirable seedlings. All too often good varieties of Phlox are replaced by ugly magenta seedlings simply because the gardener has been careless in allowing his Phlox to go to seed.

Spraying. There is hardly a plant that does not have its enemies. Mildew, black-spot, and red-spider trouble the Phlox. Keep your garden clean by destroying all herbaceous growth at the end of each year and you will find that you do not have to do a great deal of spraying. However, you will find bordeaux mixture or lime-sulphur very useful for checking mildew; use Black-leaf 40 for black-spot and red-spider. When watering Phlox apply water close to the ground; do not spray the foliage.
